

THE GIGANTIC CIA SPIES ON THE ENTIRE WORLD

[Excerpts from L'Intoxication by Pierre Nord; Tel Aviv, L'Information d'Israel, French, 5 November 1971, p 8/

Pierre Nord, internationally known specialist on espionage, opens a file on the perfect weapon of subversive warfare. His book, L'Intoxication, being published by Editions Fayard, is a document, a collection of firsthand evidence. Pierre Nord retraces the history of major contemporary concerns and evokes little known facts of the 1939-1945 war and of the subversive, revolutionary cold war which has changed the face of the earth since 1945. Here are a few excerpts from the chapter devoted to the Central Intelligence Agency.

The CIA has its headquarters sheltered from the curious in a 50-acre park in Langley, Virginia, 20 minutes by car from the White House -- because intelligence has assumed such importance in our day that the president of the United States actuates its secret services -- and just as near to the other utilizer of its data, the Pentagon, i.e., General Staff Headquarters and Department of Defense combined.

The director of the CIA, principal organization of American secret warfare, is assisted by two other human brains, one in charge of the "Intelligence Division" (we would say "information"), and the other of the "Plans Division" (which we would frankly call of "operations"... below the belt), and also by God knows how many electronic brains and other robots.

In the calm and luxury of their Langley offices, in slippers and with their jackets off if they like to be comfortable, the CIA's bosses may utilize the National Security Agency's work and that of the satellites which, on their behalf, keep a watch over and patrol the stratosphere at 40,000 kilometers an hour around the earth, the Midas II missile detectors, the photographing Samos and others, while awaiting the space stations of tomorrow.
